

Citation and Cross-Citation Rules in the ECONOMICS - Innovative and Economics Research Journal (Author Guidelines)

These rules define the principles of citation and cross-citation in papers published in the ECONOMICS Innovative and Economics Research Journal, with the aim of preserving academic integrity, preventing misuse, and supporting relevant scientific dialogue.

The citation of literature must be based on scholarly justification and on the contribution of the cited sources to the research topic. Authors have full freedom in selecting sources and are not required to cite works from this journal or related publications, except when they are methodologically and scientifically necessary for the paper.

Including citations solely for the purpose of increasing the citation count of certain authors, journals, or publications is not acceptable. Such practices are contrary to the ethical principles of scholarly publishing.

It is recommended to use a variety of sources from relevant domestic and international journals and publications, in order to ensure objectivity and a broader perspective in the paper. Cited sources must be verified, accessible, and properly referenced according to the journal's adopted citation style.

These rules apply to all manuscripts submitted for publication, and compliance with them is mandatory during the peer review and editorial approval process.
